

A Basic Guide - Fraud Prevention For New Businesses

Honesty is the ethical principle that technical writers should adhere to and promote. It is the responsibility of the technical writer to give truthful and accurate information. The writer should not omit pertinent information that would change the audience perception of the information they are receiving. In technical writing it is important to not over emphasize or under emphasize facts to persuade a reader or an audience. An example of this is omitting losses in earnings charts.

By omitting the information on years where the company did not realize profits, they could persuade investments that would not have been made if the facts were all present for review. . Honesty in technical writing is important to other ethical principles such as, legal and professional ethics.

A technical writer has the obligation to research the laws both nationally and internationally and abide by those laws. Furthermore, a technical writer needs to understand moral ethics whether legal or not and communicate the information appropriately.

Confidentiality is one ethical principle that should be a guide in technical communications. To divulge trade secrets, formulas and confidential information about a company and its practices is unethical as long as the company is acting within moral and ethical boundaries and may also present legal issues.

The basic understanding of ethical principles help employees think about dilemmas on the job and make right decisions. Wherever the initiative comes, from you or higher instances, dishonesty is always a lie. When the employee is pressed to hide negative information or mislead by exaggerating or communicating the information in a way the product sounds better than it is, this leads to an unethical behavior.

i) If there was no financial incentive, will the work from home part time job still have any merit? ii) Is the work from home part time job the opportunity and vice-versa? If the answer to part i) is no and part ii) is yes, then chances are the work from home part time job is not what it seems.
