

The Differences Of Driving Laws For Teens In The Different States In America

When a lot of visitors come from a different country and want to rent a car, they are usually bewildered as to why the laws vary in each state. Most of the traffic laws are consistent but the rules surrounding getting a license and the ones surrounding a new teenage driver vary quite a bit from state to state according to a Cincinnati DUI attorney. This article will explore some of the differences and give examples of various states on how they differ. The difference among states will offer details of the variances in the driving rules getting some of the helpful information from Cincinnati DUI attorneys.

New York is famous for having the most stringent driving laws in the country with rules not only different from other states but they also vary within their own state. No matter how long you have had your license, whether it was at 16 or 17, you can not drive alone in NY until you are 18 years old. For example, Long Island has more rules for teenage drivers than other parts of New York. Usually the states on the East coast have a higher age requirement for receiving a learning permit and a driver's license than the states in the Midwest where the ages are lower.

The age in which you may receive a learner's permit varies from state to state with states like Alaska, Arkansas, Iowa and North and South Dakota all allowing a permit at the age of 14. Other states such as Connecticut, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Rhode island and New Jersey has the rule that you have to be 16 in order to receive your learner's permit. The laws regarding the learner's permit vary in every state as well. Colorado, for example states you can get your permit at 15 and have to drive for an entire year before applying for your license. In Ohio, however, you must be 15.5 years old to get a permit and only have to hold the permit for 6 months before applying for a license. The number of driving hours is different also with a few states only requiring 20 hours of in car experience and others requiring 50 hours of driving experience.

The majority of states have a restricted license following the learner's permit which applies certain laws for the new teenage driver . Some of the rules that are part of a restricted license would be the number of people allowed in the car, the hours you are allowed to drive and higher fines on traffic tickets if they are given one. Some of these restricted rules are in place very short, like until 14 years and 3 months in North Dakota and other places have the laws until the age of 18. Once these age limits are reached, a full license is given.

Not all states require a person to take driver's education classes as a requirement to get their license but this appears to be changing. It significantly reduces the insurance costs so is it worth doing.
